(Pocket-lint) - There is an abundance of what we'll call "line 'em up" games - where the goal is to line up at least trio of same-coloured shapes to blast them away and make room for the next set - but none more engaging and, at times, infuriating than King.com's Candy Crush Saga. It's got cutesy graphics, it's saturated with sickly-sweet colours, it's somewhere between Tetris and Bejeweled and it's so testing that it'll keep you busy for many an hour. Our quick take Candy Crush Saga Format iOS, Android Price £Free (69p for each additional level set later in the game) Where iTunes | Google Play It's also rather difficult. The opening levels aren't too taxing and get you used to the game's dynamics while dashing through the almost Mario-level map, laden with unicorns, dragons and other cardboard-cut-out-styled characters. First on the agenda, you've got lives. No less than five of the blighters, so on the approach to being rather cat-like except that, in a more alien-esque way, lives regenerate slowly over time. So while this means you have five attempts at any one level, give it about an hour or so and you'll be back to full lives again and can recommence that level that seems impossible to beat. Second is the way Candy Crush works: the placement of various coloured "candies" - or sweets as us Brits like to call them - is apparently random at the start of each level. Sometimes you'll get dealt a good board, sometimes you won't. The goal is to match trios of the same colour for them to pop into a shower of sugary points, allowing the seemingly endless supply to continue to trickle down from above. But it gets more complex than that. Match four to generate a sugary bomb that will detonate a full line either horizontally or vertically, while five will create a sweet with apparent sherbert fizz: it'll zap all of one selected colour off the board. Making T-shapes and L-shapes will generate an explosive candy bomb that destroys a three by three grid twice over. Better still combine these specials for various massive effects - an essential to beat some levels. The problem is, because of the random board arrangement, it can be a right ole pain to get any good combos or lines together. A little forward thinking can help, but it's easy to get backed into a corner where no moves are left available and then the board will auto-refresh. Levels are arranged in to a variety of types, some easier than others. There are point-scoring ones, jelly-popping ones and others where you'll be pulling your hair out at the "chocolate monster" that devours everything in its path. The difficulty is definitely up there - we've spent days on level 70 and still can't beat it. Just to be extra tough each level has its own specific number of moves available. Some can be completed with loads of moves spare, which instigates the "Sugar Crush" finale, while later down the line you'll be wondering why there aren't an extra dozen moves available. Patience and, it would seem, lots of luck all play a considerable part in Candy Crush Saga. Unless you're loaded with money that is. Here's the sour part, like face-screwingly sour: in a bid to fill up their coffers with real money the game's developers have added a shop to buy five extra moves, hammer lollipops and other special items that are 69p a go. For just one. Didn't Mother always tell you that you could have just a handful and no more? If you're not the patient type that could get really, really expensive. Dashlane can keep your employees' passwords safe By Pocket-lint Promotion - 23 August 2022 If you're concerned about your organisation's security, this is a no-brainer. Worse still, after completing several of the lovely, child-like worlds the game starts to prompt for either an amount of Facebook likes or a further 69p purchase for the next world. A bit of a shame really, as this game's good enough to pay out, say, £1.99 up front and enjoy it all the way through - but the developers have other ideas. Sweets do seem to inspire greed, don't they? But so sweetly addictive Candy Crush Saga is that we've struggled to keep our distance and that's what makes it one of our choice apps. Writing by Mike Lowe. King, the mobile game developer and publisher that was recently acquired by Activision, has rolled out out a new update for its popular Candy Crush Saga free-to-play puzzle game. The new version is available for now available for Windows Phone 8.1 and Windows 10 for PC and mobile. The update adds a new episode to the game: "Continue the sweetness and delight with 15 NEW LEVELS in Candy Keep, a brand new episode! Tiffi is helping Sue the Skunk hide Candy inside her nest. But why? What are they planning? You better go and find out!" Download Candy Crush Saga in the Windows Store (opens in new tab) Candy Crush Saga is one of those mobile games so huge that pretty much everyone, everywhere knows of it, regardless of your mobile OS preferences. While the much awaited Windows Phone launch isn't long behind us, there are a couple of benefits to the game having been on iOS and Android for a while before it. If you've got your own tips to share that aren't included, be sure to share them with us in the comments below! King is doing a good job updating its Candy Crush games on Windows Phone and Windows 10 for PC and Mobile. One of those games, Candy Crush Soda Saga, has a new version with some more content for the free-to-play puzzle game. King states: "Yummy! It's a gumdrop feast! Celebrate with the Monkey King in our new Episode, Gumdrop Congrat Play 20 NEW LEVELS of gelatine galore bringing it to a grand total of 745 levels!" Download Candy Crush Soda Saga in the Windows Store (opens in new tab) Love them or loathe them, free-to-play mobile games are here to stay. You need only look at the royal fortune Candy Crush has made the King company in its short lifetime to see why. People are spending money on this franchise - some of them quite a lot - but King knows it can't sit still: last year it launched sister title Candy Crush Soda Saga to stem dwindling profits from its flagship title. More significantly, King agreed a deal that will see it acquired by gaming behemoth Activision Blizzard for a cool $5.9 billion. But before the final papers are signed King is rolling out its next game, Candy Crush Jelly Saga, which adds a couple of new twists to the otherwise familiar colour-swiping formula. King of the hill The most notable new addition is boss battles, in which the player goes head-to-head with an AI adversary. "They will play on the same board as you, so you have to change your thinking as you have another computer player interacting with the game board," Candy Crush Senior Vice President Tjodolf Sommestad tells us. "You have to plan further ahead." There's also a new type of level where the player spreads jelly across the board of candy pieces, but the boss battles are more interesting in that they hint at what might be down the line: multiplayer. Could we one day see those AI bosses replaced with other humans? "This is something we have considered and are thinking about exploring," says Sommestad. "We are interested in doing more, but we think this is the first step." It's not the only thing that alludes to the future. Jelly Saga is a game for King to "tell the story around the Candy Kingdom and bring more life to the Candy Crush universe," Sommestad explains. The more King develops the world and characters of Candy Crush, the more potential it has to expand the franchise. Sommestad also tells us that the original Candy Crush and Candy Crush Soda Saga will continue to be supported and updated alongside Jelly Saga. Last year talk show host Stephen Colbert and Liam Neeson entertained us with a parody sketch for a Candy Crush movie, but given Activision Blizzard's plan to open its own film and television studio, it may soon be more than a laughing matter. And then there's toys, TV, theme park rides... Just ask Rovio, whose ubiquitous Angry Birds franchise has branched out into all these things and more. King will also offer more immediate opportunities within the games, suggests Sommestad. "Maybe you want to customise the character you're playing as," he says, hinting at another potential way to get players to spend money. "We could do something that's interesting there." Of course, there's also potential to move onto other platforms. The charm of Candy Crush's swiping mechanic might be lost if the franchise ever found its way onto PS4/Xbox One, but there are other platforms where it might make more sense. "We haven't been a fast mover, but we're testing things," Sommestad tells us. "We're experimenting with watches internally. We want something that can add strongly to the gameplay experience. We're looking into it - it might happen in the future if products like wearables have traction." Candy Crush on a smartwatch? That could be interesting. When Activision Blizzard completes its acquisition deal with King (it should be finalised in Q2 of this year), the Candy Crush maker is going to be in a good place. Not only will it have huge financial backing, it will have the support of a corporation known for owning two of the longest-running video game franchises of all time: Call of Duty and World of Warcraft. Activision Blizzard knows how to keep games alive. "The candy crush franchise is quite young, we're launching our third title now with Jelly," says Sommestad. "Activision have decades of experience in building strong franchises, and I think they can share some of those experiences with us." The wisdom will pass both ways. Beyond digital trading card game Hearthstone, Activision Blizzard has been slow to the mobile gaming revolution, especially compared to rival EA: with King under its wing it has an opportunity to change that. Tjodolf Sommestad believes King has a lot it can teach its new owner. "I think they appreciate the fact we are strong on mobile, which is the future platform," he says. All Nintendo's mobile games will be free-to-play
